EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

A community capacity assessment was conducted for Jefferson County Human Services “Connecting Communities with Kids” project to identify the formal and informal resources in targeted high-needs areas of Jefferson County. A data collection method known as cognitive mapping was used to identify resources available in communities as well as identify resource strengths and weaknesses. Service providers (public and non-profit), current Jefferson County clients, community leaders/residents, and targeted ethnic enclaves participated in the assessment process. In addition, lists of resources from Jefferson County guide books, community providers, and cultural groups were added to the database.

Forty-two mapping workshops were held resulting in a total of 247 participants. The participants were provided with a large, blank sheet of paper, colored pencils, and markers. Following step by step instructions, participants created maps of their self-identified communities with labeled resources representing commercial businesses, community resources, government agencies, community strengths, and community weaknesses. Each map was then entered into a Geographical Information Systems (GIS) to enable aggregate analysis of resource availability.

Identification of community resources provides (1) a comprehensive database of services available in Jefferson County; (2) a basis upon which Jefferson County can build communication networks and cooperation among county and community providers; (3) the ability to create an efficient system that avoids duplication of efforts; (4) an understanding of the geographical distribution of resource types to build community-based delivery systems (systems of care); and (5) the ability to identify areas where resources are lacking in Jefferson County.

All identified resources were provided to Colorado’s 2-1-1 system, which is the national abbreviated dialing code for free access to health and human services information and referral (I&R). 2-1-1 is an easy-to-remember and universally recognizable number that makes a critical connection between individuals and families in need and the appropriate community-based organizations and government agencies. Housing the data with 2-1-1 allows statewide access to resources and bi-annual updating to keep the information current.<sup>1</sup>

KEY FINDINGS

TOTAL RESOURCES IDENTIFIED

- The mapping process identified 1480 organizations that provide services or resources that were not included in Jefferson County resource guidebook and lists.
- Jefferson County resource guidebook and lists contained 535 resources and services, of which there were 339 separate addresses (multiple services were offered at some locations).
- Mapping participants identified 318 (59.4%) of the resources already included in the Jefferson County resource guidebook and lists.
- A total of 1819 unique organizations were identified through the combination of the mapping process and compiling existing lists.

- A total of 760 resources not currently in the Colorado 2-1-1 database were identified and provided to 2-1-1.

GENERAL MAPPING OUTCOMES

- The mapping process identified significantly more resources than were listed in the Jefferson County resource guides in nearly all the resource categories.
- Jefferson County Resource guides were devoid of Social and Spiritual resources, a category that was the fourth highest in number of resources identified in the mapping process.
- The most commonly identified resources were education, recreation, health care, safety and legal services, social and spiritual support, emergency services, housing, and mental health services.
- Providers and clients knew about different resources and services in the communities. There was very little overlap in identification of resources with the exception of the Education and to a lesser extent, Recreation.
- Childcare resources were one of the categories that had a great disparity in identified information between the providers and clients. Most providers identified childcare that was before and after school care. Most clients identified all day childcare for preschoolers.
- Some resource types included in the Jefferson County guide and lists were largely unknown to the mapping participants, both providers and clients, indicating a problem with information dissemination. Examples include Aging and Adult/Senior Services and to a lesser extent Family Assistance and Nutrition.
- The mapping sessions increased the knowledge of health care resources three-fold.
- Mapping sessions identified many resources in Denver County, especially along Colfax. Some of these Denver resources are in the Jefferson County resource guide and lists but most are not. Since providers recognize the Denver-located resources are used by Jefferson County clients and the clients identify the Denver resources as places they use, this information is critical to include in resource lists.
- Some resources are mainly identified as existing in Denver, indicating there are service gaps in Jefferson County or lack of knowledge about certain resources in Jefferson County.
- Jefferson County resource guide and lists identify some categories of services as existing mainly in Denver, while the mappers identified the services as located in Jefferson County and Denver. Examples include Developmental Disabilities Services, Emergency Services, and Transportation Services.
- There are fewer resources and services identified in the Littleton area than the other study areas. This was true in both the Jefferson County Resource guidebook and lists and by the participants in the mapping process.

- Services participants felt were lacking included affordable housing dispersed throughout the county, affordable and year-round childcare, mental health care especially for clients with less severe needs, after school programs, a comprehensive public transportation system, health care providers who accepted Medicaid, special needs services, and culturally responsive services.

PROVIDERS

- Providers often knew about many resources not included in the Jefferson County resource guidebook and lists. This information gap significantly disadvantages providers new to service delivery in Jefferson County and disadvantages their clients. Examples include Developmental Disabilities Resources, Drug and Alcohol Abuse Treatment Centers, Employment Services, Family Assistance Resources, Health care, Housing Assistance, Mentoring and Advocacy Services, and Offense-Specific Resources.
- The lack of a comprehensive central resource list necessitates informal networking among providers to meet the needs of their clients. A referral information system built on informal networks is inefficient, incomplete, and likely inaccessible to many providers and clients.
- Knowledge about different provider-sponsored resources and services were largely limited to the group that provided the service. For example, government providers identified mainly government resources; community non-profit providers identified mainly non-profit resources; and faith-based identified mainly faith-based resources. This lack of a shared knowledge base indicates the need to actively engage and bring together providers from all sectors to build an integrated systems of care.
- The faith-based community was the most difficult provider group to recruit into the process. Building a comprehensive, community-based system of care using the wrap-around approach will require special efforts to create partnerships with the faith-based community.

CLIENTS

- Clients had more knowledge about certain resources than Jefferson County resource guide and lists or Jefferson County providers. Examples include Health care services.
- Client satisfaction and dissatisfaction was closely aligned with the client group they were in. Foster parents were generally satisfied with the level of support and services available to them. Adoptive parents, many of whom were prior foster parents, were angry because they experienced a severe reduction in services once their foster child had been adopted by them.
- The most frequently used services by the client participants were family assistance, recreation and churches.

ETHNIC ENCLAVES AND FOCUS GROUPS

- The ethnic enclaves differed significantly from each other in their knowledge of services, access to services, and desire to use services even though they had similar unmet needs.

- Russian immigrants were the least knowledgeable about resources or their potential eligibility to receive government services. Utilization is impeded by cultural views of the role of government and self-reliance. This was especially evident in the discussion of workforce resources since employment among this group is viewed as a personal responsibility.
- The Latino population makes up the largest minority group in Jefferson County. East-central areas bordering Denver County are over 25% Latino. Important resources used by this population include libraries and they indicated a need for bi-lingual staff and resources, specific health care clinics that provide sliding scales or accept Medicaid, and organizations that provide activities for children and youths. Participants were frustrated with the lack of employment opportunities, which is partly related to the discounting of education and skills obtained in their home country. A lack of health insurance was a common problem among the Latino population as well as other ethnic groups.
- Native Americans were concerned about obtaining housing, medical care, and resources for their children. Unlike the other groups, the Native Americans talked about going in and out of homeless shelters and identified a wide array of housing assistance services. They felt there is a lack of resources intended to help families stay intact, help buy and maintain a car, and provide stable housing options. Many resources used were provided by community non-profit organizations targeted at Native Americans.
- Youths at The Road, a drop-in youth center that targets youths and young adults with mental health needs, identified resources used by many young people. These included recreation centers, movie theatres, and libraries. In addition, vocational schools and training programs, health clinics, and low cost clothing stores were identified.

COMMUNITY STRENGTHS

- More strengths than weaknesses were identified in the mapping process indicating the study area communities have significant assets upon which to develop a community-based service delivery system.
- Recreation facilities were the most commonly identified strength. Included in this category were city recreation centers, local parks, bike paths, public libraries, and even indoor shopping malls. Participants rated this category high primarily due to the low costs, safe environments, and availability of youth activities.
- Education-related resources were also seen as strengths. K-12 schools, Head Start programs, and Red Rocks Community College were specifically mentioned. Education in general was the reason for valuing the resource but some included additional programs such as free breakfast and lunch programs, and childcare and educational support provided by Head Start programs.
- Participants indicated some health care resources as strengths. Lutheran Medical and The Children's Hospital were listed often, as were various WIC offices. Some reasons given were affordability, and willingness to work on a sliding scale or to file with Medicaid.
- Most of the identified strengths were government-sponsored agencies followed by non-profit agencies.

COMMUNITY WEAKNESSES

- Fewer weaknesses than strengths were identified in the mapping process; however, a greater proportion of the weaknesses were found on or north of Colfax Street.
- The most commonly cited weaknesses were areas rather than resources. “Bad areas” had drugs, prostitution, gangs, and crime or more generically were places that felt unsafe. Many of the bad areas were on or near Colfax Street.
- Many participants cited transportation as a weakness. In particular, public transportation was not scheduled frequently enough, late enough, and did not serve enough areas. Some participants also mentioned particular intersections where accidents were frequent.
- Despite the large number of participants who viewed recreation opportunities as community strengths, a few saw community weaknesses in this area. Participants who listed recreation resources as weaknesses generally discussed unsafe public parks or parks lacking in playground equipment. In addition, lack of after-school programs and a lack of sufficient activities for older children were cited as weaknesses.

COMMUNITY CAPACITY ASSESSMENT

INTRODUCTION

This is the final report on the cognitive mapping component of the HHS grant. The mapping project has been used to identify formal and informal resources in targeted high-needs areas of Jefferson County. Identification of community resources provides (1) a comprehensive database of services available in Jefferson County; (2) a basis upon which Jefferson County can build communication networks and cooperation among county and community providers; (3) the ability to create an efficient system that avoids duplication of efforts; (4) an understanding of the geographical distribution of resource types to begin to build community-based delivery systems (systems of care); and (5) the ability to identify areas where resources are lacking in Jefferson County.

Service providers (public and non-profit), current Jefferson County clients, community leaders/residents, and targeted ethnic enclaves participated in the mapping. In addition, lists of resources from Jefferson County, community providers, and cultural groups were added to the mapping database. Mapping analysis in this report provides information about spatial distributions of resources, resource deficits and redundancies at the community level, possible provider and resource partnerships, and community strengths, weaknesses, and potential improvements suggested by mapping participants.

All identified resources were provided to Colorado's 2-1-1 system, which is the national abbreviated dialing code for free access to health and human services information and referral (I&R). 2-1-1 is an easy-to-remember and universally recognizable number that makes a critical connection between individuals and families in need and the appropriate community-based organizations and government agencies. Housing the data with 2-1-1 allows statewide access to resources and bi-annual updating to keep the information current.<sup>2</sup>

The report begins with a short description of the history of cognitive mapping followed by how the method was adapted for resource identification, including a description of the actual process used in this project. Next, a section on Geographical Information Systems describes how individual hand-drawn maps can be aggregated and analyzed. The third section provides descriptive statistics for the mapping detailing the:

- Number of participants of each type attending each session (i.e., service providers, Jefferson County clients, community leaders/residents, and targeted enclaves);
- Means of data collection for each session (i.e., mapping versus focus group);
- Number of maps produced at each session and overall; and
- Demographic characteristics of each participant group.

Following are analyses of the data by resource categories. These maps provide comparisons between already known resources or services and those discovered through the cognitive mapping process. Although this report does not attempt to sort the data in all of the ways possible, the GIS analysis will attempt to provide examples for how the coded data, which accompanies the report in electronic format, can be used.

Following presentation of the GIS data, other information gathered from the mapping is summarized:

- aspects of the community that participants identified as strengths or weaknesses are broken down by resource layer (e.g., education, health care, employment) and type (e.g., government sponsored, community non-profit);
- services that participants reported using, as well as the resource layer and percent of participants reporting use of each, are listed;
- resources or services reported by respondents as lacking in their community are outlined; and
- information on resources identified by focus groups is presented.

Concluding remarks are followed by appendices including all the GIS maps and more detailed information for several parts of the report.

COGNITIVE MAPPING METHODOLOGY AND ANALYTICAL TECHNIQUES

Resource identification was done through a technique known as cognitive mapping. Below is a description of the development of the cognitive mapping technique as well as its application to the current project.

COGNITIVE MAPPING: ORIGIN AND USES

Cognitive mapping did not originate from research on humans. Rather, the term cognitive map was originally used to describe the mental representations that rats develop as they navigate the same maze multiple times (Tolman, 1948). Eventually, researchers became interested in using the information from cognitive maps in the human context, and the resulting collection of methods became known as cognitive mapping. Later the term expanded to include mental depictions of more abstract entities, like ideas or chains of events. Since its inception, cognitive mapping has been used as an approach to a number of real-world issues.

Cognitive mapping's first practical application was in the field of urban planning. Using mapping methods described below, Kevin Lynch (1960) was able to comprehend which elements of the city stood out to residents and had a positive emotional impact. This type of research, he felt, could be used to design cities that were memorable and provided a positive environment. Nasar (1988) extended Lynch's study by including a model of how attributes of the city influenced the affective responses of residents and visitors.

Cognitive mapping is used to evaluate mental representations of smaller areas. Mapping of specific neighborhoods (Quaiser-Pohl, Lehmann, & Eid, 2004; Uzzell, Pol, & Badenas, 2002), college campuses (Hardwick, Wooldridge, & Rinalducci, 1983; Holahan, & Dobrowolny, 1978; Sholl, 1987), and buildings (Moeser, 1988; O'Laughlin & Brubaker, 1998; O'Neill, 1991) adds to knowledge about how spatial abilities develop and are utilized, the skills related to map creation, and the mapping abilities of various groups. Numerous overlying maps of these smaller areas have even been used to program autonomous mobile robots (Yoshino, 1991).

Mapping of non-spatial information is used to approach a variety of problems, although the methods employed in these situations are unique variations on the techniques for spatial mapping. In education, mapping is used to improve reading and listening skills (Gold, 1984), to help students make meaningful structural changes in written work (Reynolds & Hart, 1990), and to understand how social networks influence academic performance (Fletcher, Newsome, Nickerson, & Bazley, 2001). Cognitive mapping techniques are also used to assist in negotiations (Bonham, 1993) and to study decision making processes (Hines, 2000; Young, 1996). Other examples of applied uses of cognitive mapping can be found in fields as diverse as marketing (Clarke, Mackaness, & Ball, 2003; Houston & Walker, 1996; Kitchen & Spickett-Jones, 2003), medicine (Bellis & Grimley, 1999; Wiginton, 1997), and tourism (Fridgen, 1987). Of note is the consistent success of cognitive mapping as a method for approaching such a variety of topics.

METHODOLOGICAL CONSIDERATIONS

Almost anyone can successfully complete a mapping exercise. Studies have consistently found that the quality of female and male's maps are similar (see Evans, 1980 for a review; Magana & Norman, 1980; O'Laughlin, & Brubaker, 1998), and these types of methods have also been used successfully with respondents of a variety of ages (Quaiser-Pohl, Lehmann, & Eid, 2004). Map quality is not influenced by drawing skill (Evans, 1980; Hardwick, Wooldridge, & Rinalducci, 1983). The maps required in this study require particularly little drawing skill as participants are only asked to draw boundaries (for which they are provided a ruler), mark their home with an "X", and identify landmarks with squares.

The individual characteristic that most consistently influences map quality is familiarity with the target area, where quality increases with familiarity (Evans, 1980; Fridgen, 1987; Unger & Wandersman, 1985). Each of the participants drew the area they self-identified as their most recognizable. Directing participants to designate boundaries ensured that the map did not exceed their knowledge of an area.

Other findings have suggested ways in which maps are commonly distorted. For example, locations of importance to the participant are often drawn larger or more centrally than other map elements (Holahan & Dobrowolny, 1978; Kathlene, 1997). In this study, the objective is to identify resources of importance to the participant; having the maps drawn to scale is irrelevant because the exact geographic coordinates for each location will be determined during the coding process. The data analysis method also does not require participants accurately represent distances between points, draw streets correctly, or square non-perpendicular intersections. In short, information gleaned from the maps is not dependent upon the drawing skills of the participants.

Other research has focused on ways to make mapping more effective. A common recommendation is to use multiple methods of data collection in addition to mapping, such as surveys, interviews, or focus groups (Daniels & Johnson, 2002; Hines, 2000; Kitchen, 1996; Magana & Norman, 1980). In this project, multiple methods for each participant group were deemed infeasible due to time limitations. In cases where multiple methods are not feasible, choosing the method which best fits the problem at hand is advised (Daniels & Johnson, 2002; Hines, 2003; Kitchen, 1996). In this use, mapping generates about 80% more unique information than traditional survey methods (Colorado Institute of Public Policy, 2004); therefore mapping was the primary method. However, the workshop sessions incorporated group discussions during and after the mapping exercise to provide additional resource identification through a focus group-type technique.

Another design characteristic is the use of multiple coders unfamiliar with the study hypotheses (Daniels & Johnson, 2002). However, when multiple raters have been used their agreement has been nearly perfect (Quaiser-Pohl, Lehmann, & Eid, 2004) and, in the current study, coding involves recording objective location information rather than subjective judgments of map features.

ADAPTATION OF MAPPING METHODS FOR RESOURCE IDENTIFICATION

Each use of mapping described above has required a unique adaptation of the method. Participants have been asked to sketch maps, arrange pictures of pieces of paper according to their location or importance, locate points on a map, circle areas on a map, recognize features on an aerial photograph, or label features on a blank map. Essentially, the literature suggests that as many methods of mapping exist as purposes for using it.

While using cognitive mapping for resource identification is a novel application, adapting mapping methods for new purposes is not an unusual practice. In this project, participants were first provided background on the overall goals of the project as well as their role in achieving those goals. The hope was that understanding the importance of the project would encourage conscientious participation. Then, participants were provided with a large blank sheet of paper and asked to indicate the street or physical boundaries within which they most commonly travel. Street maps of the area were available to help them in this and later tasks, and they were encouraged to work cooperatively on each step with their fellow participants. Following a visualization exercise to assist them in accessing non-verbal memories, they were asked to fill in details such as streets, natural features, and resources they commonly use. It was explained that these maps were not meant to be artistic works; simple boxes and lines drawn with their rulers would suffice to represent objects and locations. Once the maps were complete, participants were asked to label various types of resources with colors corresponding to commercial businesses, community resources, government agencies, community strengths, and community weaknesses. They also completed a survey asking for detailed description of the important resources and features on their maps and to provide any additional information regarding resources lacking in their area. Each map was then entered into a GIS database, as described in a later section of the report.

Despite some unique adaptations for this project, the methods used shared attributes with other mapping techniques. Like many studies that utilize cognitive mapping, mapping for resource identification asks respondents to provide a rough sketch of an area familiar to them, including relevant features and landmarks. Asking respondents to identify their own perceived boundaries of areas, combining individual maps to create a more comprehensive representation of an area, using computer programs to process map data, and avoiding concrete time limits to complete the mapping exercise have all been done in other studies. This consistency in elements of the design with past studies, while extending the method to meet the new purpose of resource identification increases the likelihood of success.

SUMMARY

Overall, it is clear that cognitive mapping has been used to approach a variety of problems facing diverse populations. Although an established technique, in use for over 40 years, it remains flexible enough to be adapted to new research questions. While resource identification is a novel application of the method, cognitive mapping is a unique way to obtain information not harvested using more traditional means. Further, this new application of the cognitive mapping is robust in regards to many of the common limitations of the method.

GIS ANALYSIS TECHNIQUE

Geographic Information Systems play an important role in the cognitive mapping project. It aggregates the thousands of data points collected from the participant-drawn maps. In addition, each distinct physical address has dozens of descriptors that identify not only who provided the information but also secondary data such as the participants perceptions of a particular resource or service (Longley, Goodchild, Maguire & Rhind, 2001). The data is accessible in Excel-type tables that can be easily queried and displayed on a digital street map (Longley, Goodchild, Maguire & Rhind, 2001). This analysis allows for preliminary interpretation of the data set, such as the dispersion or clustering of resources in geographic areas (Heagerty and Lele, 1998; Reich and Davis, 2003). GIS has the ability to incorporate external data sources, such as census data, which can be layered with the cognitive mapping data. Integrating the cognitive mapping data with GIS software creates nearly limitless ability to analyze the data and allows for easily interpreted visual results.

For this project the particular GIS capabilities are:

1. Visual representation of addresses and areas via data points, data lines, and data shapes;
2. The ability to layer data points for sorting, categorizing, and selection purposes;
3. Accompanying tables of descriptive variables for each data layer with the ability to search and sort individual data points based on particular variable(s); and
4. The ability to export the data to conduct advanced spatial analysis.

Cognitive mapping has not been comprehensively integrated with GIS to the degree done in this project, although elementary integration has been done in some previous projects (Fulton, Horan & Serrano, 1997; Kathlene, 1997; Kathlene & Horan, 1998; McMurrin & Horan, 2002). The cognitive mapping process can be greatly enhanced, especially for analysis purposes, by using GIS to create unique, specialized parameters (for a theoretical model, see Jordan, Raubal, Gartrell & Egenhofer, 1998). The potential outcomes of such a union include:

- The capability to export large amounts of data in an Excel-type format that can be searched and sorted based on any given number of criteria;
- The ability to organize and sort data in a spatial manner (i.e. in the form of maps); and
- The opportunity to create an easily updated database for organizing additional data gathered by the cognitive mapping process and through other resource identification processes.

These are general capabilities of the combined processes. More specific uses can be created in the future, such as a searchable web-based provider resource database and the ability to use the gathered data to identify physical and/or service areas with inadequate resources. The latter allows providers to demonstrate specific needs, important in pursuing future programmatic funding. These specific uses are described in greater detail below:

Provider Resource Database. In the future, the web-based database can be converted into a tool for social service providers to identify available resources and their locations for clients. The end user (a case-worker) would be able to search for particular resources based on any number of criteria or a combination of criteria. For example, one might enter necessary criteria such as Rental Assistance Housing Resource located within 2 miles of a given location that also caters to Spanish speaking clientele. After these attributes or criteria are entered into the appropriate locations on the webpage, a list of all the resources or providers that fit these criteria would pop up, similar to the business name search feature available through a site such as Map Quest. Finally, digital maps could be generated with driving directions provided for the case-worker to print out and give to their client. It is also possible to create the system so that public transportation routes to services could be provided to clients.

Needs Assessments. The database can be used to conduct comprehensive, quantifiable, and defensible needs assessments. A social service provider administrator or grant writer could search the data described above in conjunction with Census data, etc., to reveal areas of need or areas of excess.<sup>3</sup> A strategic plan could be developed to determine where a new office or access point for a particular resource should be located to serve the greatest number of clients. This type of spatial analysis is based on quantifiable numbers and distances and can be used to justify a particular course of action either for internal/external accountability or to acquire funding for various projects aimed at community resource and social service distribution.

Structure of the GIS system:

The structure of the GIS system for this project is based on three principles.

1. The structure must be flexible and allow for the maximum amount of data to be stored and easily accessed.
2. The structure must be relatively simple such that an inexperienced GIS user can understand the sorting, searching, and selecting potential of the system.
3. The GIS system must be able to organize data from a variety of sources and be easily updated overtime.

The first step to organizing the data is to create basic social service or resource categories (in GIS terms these categories are referred to as layers.) Each layer must be broad enough to encompass a variety of unique data points (identified resources) but narrow enough to create a good classification system for a beginning search and find procedure. These basic layers are the essential framework of the GIS system and the search capabilities of the system that providers could use; therefore, they should match either the basic social service field breakdown of resource types and/or be intuitively organized. For example, there are 24 layers in this project including such layers as Housing, Mental Health Services, Transportation, Health Care, Emergency Services, Domestic Violence, and Victim Services. Within each layer there are key fields with similar categories across all the layers. For example, the data field “Resource Type” exists in each of the 24 layers and contains only one of five values: Governmental, Community Non-Profit, Faith-Based, Private, or Unknown. This allows queries and linkages to be made across layers. As an illustration, a user can search for all the Community Non-Profit sponsored resources or services in two or more of the layers and combine these results on one map.

Search or selection functions work on a layer by layer level within ArcMap. For example, within the Housing layer there are attributes such as Resource Name, Resource Address and Resource Hours of Availability. These attributes are easily sorted. For example, there should only be one Lakewood Housing Authority (LHA) but if there are two locations for LHA they can be distinguished from one another in the data table due to the different values entered in the Resource Address cell. However, not all searches are done based on a known name or location; therefore, a more extensive list of attributes must exist to properly describe each resource. Some examples of other attribute identifiers might be Resource Type (government sponsored, private, faith-based, or community non-profit) or Funding Source. Another type of attribute would be a binary descriptor such as Used by Respondent Yes/No. This would apply to data points identified by clients and useful in various types of subjective quality analyses that one might want to perform on the dataset at some future date. Below is an example of the layer table structure and associated attributes.

<sup>3</sup> For example, it might be found that 65% of all users of a certain type of resource (this data would be collected by cognitive mapping alone) live “x” number of miles away (analysis preformed by the GIS system) from a particular needed or frequently accessed resource (gathered through cognitive mapping and other sources).

TABLE 1. HOUSING LAYER ATTRIBUTE TABLE

Survey ID	Respondent Category	Resource Name	Resource Type	Hours of Availability	Funding Type	Used by Respondent
0105	Client	LHA	Government	9am-5pm	Government	No
0431	Provider	LHA	Government	9am-5pm	Government	N/A
0302	Community Member	Lakeside Apartments	Private	N/A	N/A	Yes
0746	Client	Allison Care Center	Community Non-Profit	N/A	Private	Yes

Using the table above, it is easy to see the large number of searches possible based on seven attributes. For example, a provider might want to find all government sponsored housing resources. The search would use “Resource Type=Government.” The first two rows would be selected from the search. If housing resources provided by community non-profits is of interest, the search would be written as “Respondent Category=Client and Resource Type=Community Non-Profit and Used by Respondent=Yes.” In the table above, this would select only the last row.

It is important to remember each row represents one unique data point on the GIS map and therefore represents one unique resource. Resources can be identified and placed on the map multiple times, as in the above example, with the first and second row both being the Resource Type “LHA.” However, what distinguishes the two data points is not the location on the map but the multiple attributes in the table listed above. Here, LHA was identified once by a provider and once by a client. A comprehensive database with separate rows of multiple criteria allows for flexibility in the analysis of resources ranging from a simple resource search engine to a complex spatial analysis tool that can be used to numerically describe the layout of resources and services in Jefferson County.

DESCRIPTIVE STATISTICS OF COGNITIVE MAPPING DATA

MAPPING PARAMETERS

To create a comprehensive picture of resources in Jefferson County, it was essential to include a full array of participants. Community resource providers included not only County employees, but employees of other government-sponsored, non-profit, and faith-based agencies. Client participants included TANF, child welfare, adoptive/foster, Tri-County Workforce, and Head Start clients. Community residents were invited to participate from diverse groups such as fire and police departments, other city agencies, Chambers of Commerce, special-interest support and discussion groups, school parent-teacher associations, and other proactive community groups.<sup>4</sup>

Seven Jefferson County cities were the focus of the mapping project. Clients and community resident groups were drawn from these areas: Lakewood, Arvada, Wheat Ridge, Golden, Littleton, and the mountain communities of Conifer and Evergreen.<sup>5</sup> See Figure 1 below.

<sup>4</sup> Some community residents were providers of services and coded as such. Other community residents were users of services and included in the client category.

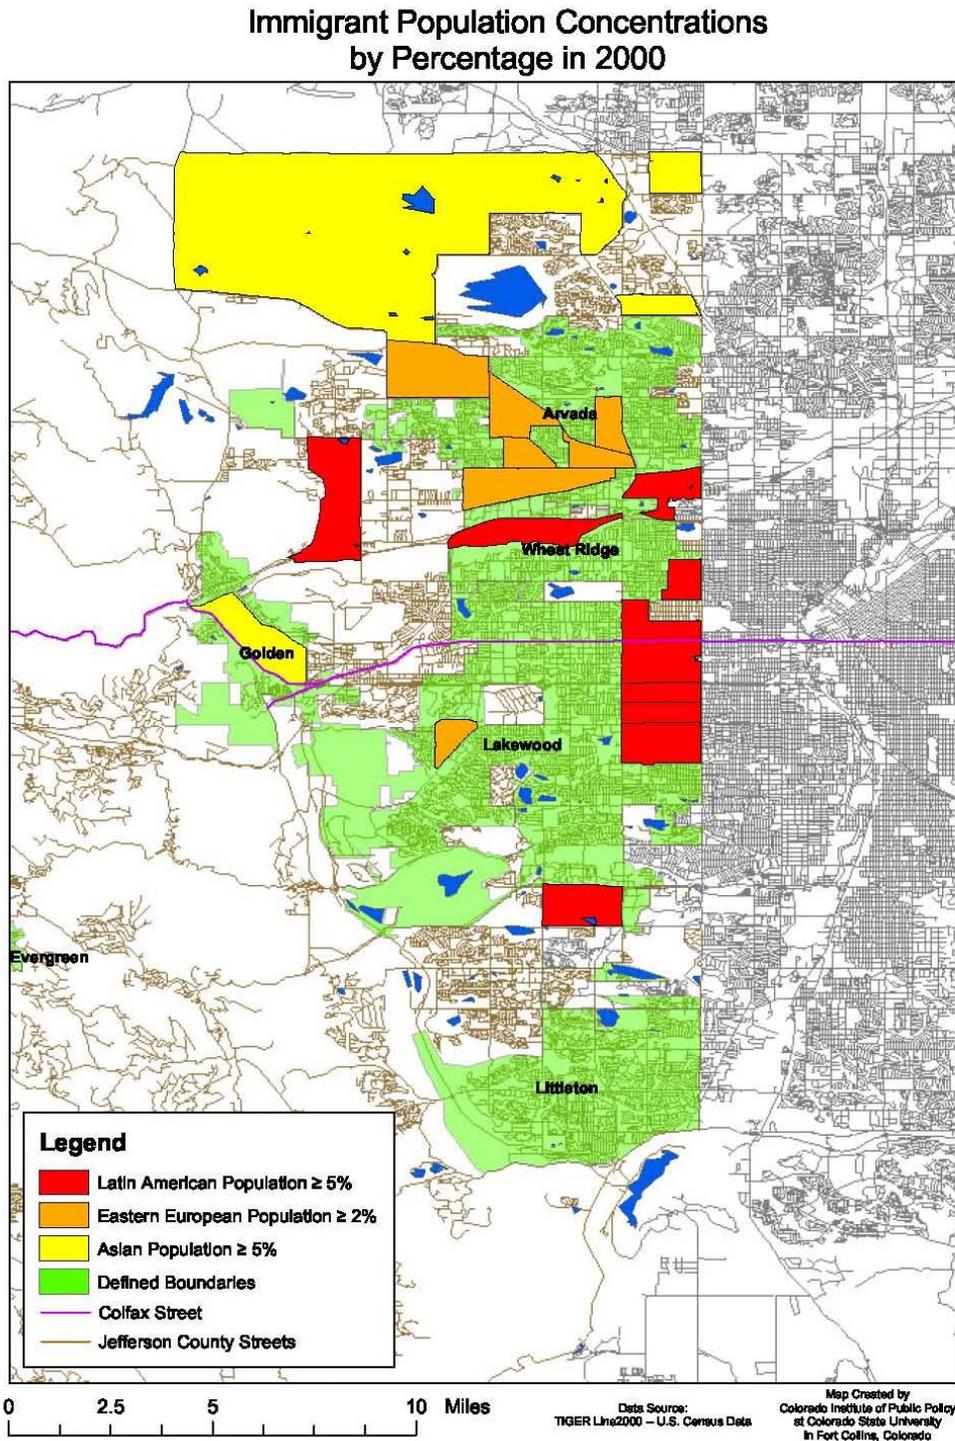

Mapping sessions and/or focus groups were held at locations in each of these communities to provide nearby access to their homes, as shown in Figure 2. A total of 42 workshops were held.

Special sessions were held with members of the dominant ethnic groups, identified using census data, including Native American, Latino, and Russian community residents.<sup>6</sup>

<sup>6</sup> CIPP provided Jefferson County with the ethnic enclave areas based on the 2000 Census. The Asian communities fell outside the project boundaries set by Jefferson County (see Figure 1) and, unlike Russians, Latinos, and Native Americans, Jefferson County did not request mapping with the Asian community.

Immigrant population, rather than ethnic identity only, captures first generation residents; a group that is likely to face significant language barriers, employment difficulties, and social service knowledge gaps. Among the Latin American immigrants, most come from Mexico followed by Central America. Eastern Europeans are mainly Russian. The Asian population is composed of Vietnamese, Korean, and Indian.

As found in the state of Colorado, the Latino/Hispanic population is the largest ethnic population in Jefferson County. The highest concentrations of the Latino population are largely found on the central eastern area of Jefferson County (Lakewood and Arvada) on the border of Denver County. Figure 4 below shows the Latino growth patterns from 1990 to 2000. Numbers on the map are the percentage of the area's population that was Latino in the 2000 Census.

MAPPING PARTICIPATION

Between fall 2003 and fall 2004, approximately 250 participants met with representatives of the Colorado Institute of Public Policy. Participants included providers of social services (government-sponsored, private, faith-based, and non-profit), clients of social services (TANF clients, adoption/foster/Head Start parents, and other recipients of services), and community residents (members of special groups like grandparents raising grandchildren, young adults, and students in ESL classes). Most groups participated in the cognitive mapping exercise; however, with groups such as non-English speakers, it was more appropriate to conduct focus groups. The tables below summarize the participation from each group and the type of information gathered during each session. Unless otherwise indicated, the type of data gathered is maps.

<sup>7</sup> Participation rates among clients were affected by logistical difficulties. (1) Jefferson County was responsible for identifying their clients. They discovered that nearly half of the client database was missing full addresses, thereby dropping the recruitment population by 50%. (2) Jefferson County was responsible for scheduling client workshops since only they knew where their clients were located and had knowledge about the public meeting resources available in Jefferson County communities. A minimum of three weeks was needed to account for time to mail invitations and receive RSVPs. Most workshops were scheduled with only 10 days notice. (3) Mailing was delayed as Jefferson County Human Services waited to gain approval from their legal counsel to send out client invitation letters. (4) Because the client addresses were confidential, Jeffco project employees had to generate and paste address labels on the stuffed envelopes provided by CIPP. It is unknown to the Institute how long this process took. (5) Originally, the recruitment letters were typed on Colorado Institute of Public Policy letterhead and stuffed in the Institute's envelopes. Jefferson County Human Services changed the protocol to have the Jeffco logo and envelope used. Subsequent workshops with clients revealed an overwhelming dissatisfaction with Jefferson County social services, which suggests that recruitment coming directly from Jeffco could have been met with skepticism and/or distrust. This last problem is a symptom of the current social service delivery system that led to Jeffco's pursuit of a systems of care. In retrospect, it is clear the invitations should have come from a neutral third party.

Clients, foster and adoptive parents were distributed throughout the study area (see Figure 1). The following map shows the home location cross-streets of these participants and hypothetical boundaries of their identified communities, ranging from one-third mile to one mile around their residence. Some community boundaries drawn on the maps were larger than one mile; few were smaller than one-third mile. Figure 1 below indicates the mapping participants who were current and previous users of Jefferson County social services had, collectively, knowledge of nearly all the study areas.

GIS DESCRIPTIVE STATISTICS ON IDENTIFIED RESOURCES

The following statistics are based 184 maps coded and entered into the GIS system.

Total number of resource points collected = 5,988<sup>8</sup>

Total number of resource points with recognized addresses = 4,654<sup>9</sup>

Total number of resources collected through cognitive mapping = 3,845<sup>10, 11</sup>

Total number resources from Jefferson County resource guide and lists = 543<sup>12</sup>

Counts by Resource Layer of Points Collected through Cognitive Mapping:

- Aging and Adult Services = 23 points
- Anger Management = 1 point

<sup>8</sup> Represents all resources collected both by cognitive mapping and from information provided by Jefferson County. Collected resources are all points from all maps entered into Excel spreadsheet.

<sup>9</sup> Represents all resources collected both by cognitive mapping and from information provided by Jefferson County. Recognized addresses are those that were able to be identified in the phone book and/or Map Quest and were recognized by ArcMap. In GIS terminology, these are the geo-coded points.

<sup>11</sup> The Commercial layer numbers were left out of most of the calculations because commercial resources were usually landmarks on the maps and not identified as important community resources or social services.

<sup>12</sup> 543 services were listed in resource materials provided to CIPP by Jefferson County (Jefferson County Public Schools Resource Guide, n.d.; Jefferson County Department of Health and Environment, June 2002, November 2002, February 2003a, February 2003b, June 2003, July 2003, August 2003, September 2003, November 2003, December 2003a, December 2003b, February 2004, April 2004a, April 2004b, April 2004c, April 2004d, May 2004a, May 2004b). Of the 543 resources, eight did not have physical addresses due to confidential locations or were limited to hotline services only. Of the remaining 535 mapped services, 259 (49%) were childcare, preschools, elementary, middle schools and high schools. Multiple services were offered at some locations, reducing the number of unique addresses to 339. Of the 535 services with known geographical locations, 318 (59.4%) were identified by participants in the cognitive mapping. As the GIS analysis will demonstrate, most of the resources identified came from the mapping process and focus groups, not from the Jefferson County resource guides.

- Child Abuse Reporting = 6 points
- Childcare = 63 points
- Commercial = 1600 points<sup>13</sup>
- Developmental Disabilities = 25 points
- Domestic Violence Prevention and Treatment = 8 points
- Drug and Alcohol Abuse Treatment = 73 points
- Education = 841 points
- Emergency Services = 228 points
- Employment = 82 points
- Family Assistance/Nutrition = 61 points
- Health care = 362 points
- Housing = 198 points
- Mental Health = 164 points
- Mentoring/Advocacy = 33 points
- Miscellaneous = 135 points
- Offense-Specific Resources = 11 points
- Recreation = 751 points
- Safety/Legal = 342 points
- Social/Spiritual = 347 points
- Support Group = 2 points
- Transportation = 69 points
- Victim Services = 20 points

An important measure of resource comprehensiveness is the repetition rate.<sup>14</sup> Higher repetition rates represent increased levels of confidence that most of the resources and services have been identified. The final repetition rate for all the layers combined, excluding the Commercial layer because of its large number of non-resource related points, was approximately 55%.<sup>15</sup> The target repeat rate was 80%, a goal recommended by CIPP at the beginning of the project.<sup>16</sup> See Appendix B for a breakdown of the repetition rates by categories.<sup>17</sup>

Counts by Resource Type by Total Number of Resource Points Collected:

- Government Sponsored = 2,039 points (includes 3 points in the Commercial Layer)
- Faith-Based = 474 points (includes 0 points in the Commercial Layer)
- Community Non-Profit = 843 points (includes 57 points in the Commercial Layer)

<sup>14</sup> The repeat rate is defined as the percentage of points that appear on at least two of the participants' maps. For example, if respondent X lists Jeffco Action Center, plus an addition 9 resources, and respondent Y also lists the same Jeffco Action Center but 9 completely different resources the repeat rate would be 2 (the two Jeffco Action Center points) divided by 20 (the total number of points on both maps.) This would be a 10% return rate, which would indicate that the two respondents had limited knowledge about the same resources.

<sup>15</sup> The repeat rate by category ranged from a low of no repeats in support group categories with very few identified resources to 93% in Family Assistance and Nutrition resources.

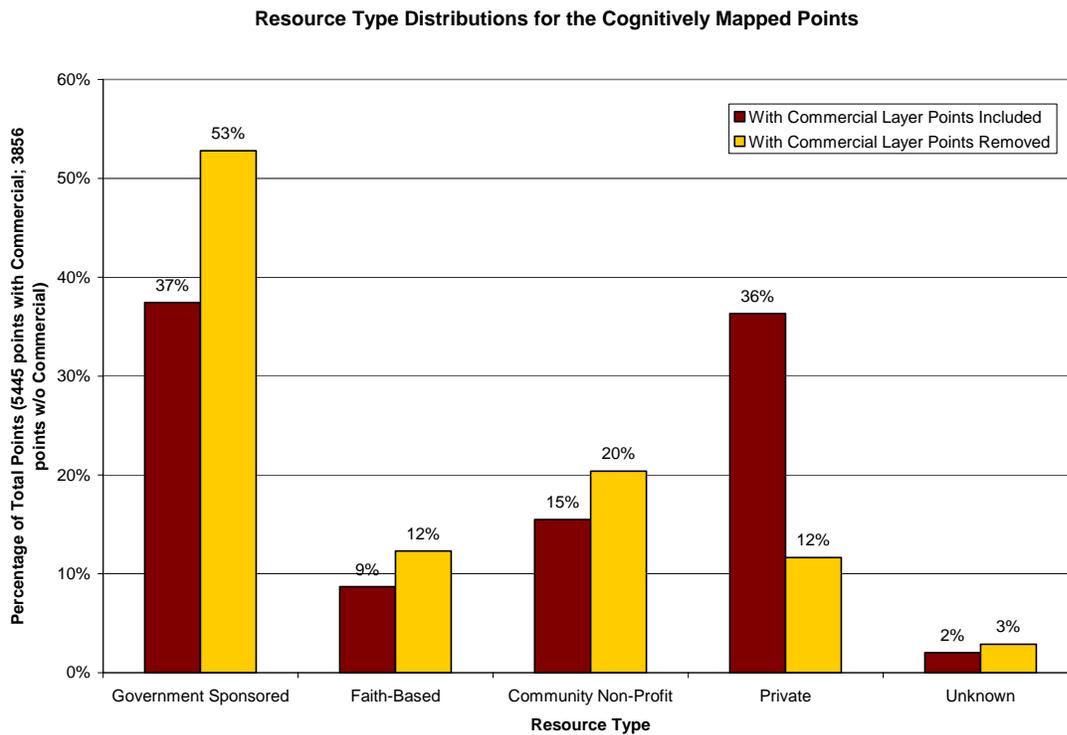

<sup>16</sup> The 80% repeat threshold was determined by CIPP to be the optimal level of information return on time and resource investment. Originally the goal was to have 450 participants. Jefferson County Human Services requested the number be reduced to 250. More maps would have produced higher category repetition rates; therefore the lower overall rate is directly related to the number of maps produced.

- Private = 1,978 points (includes 1,529 points in the Commercial Layer)
- Unknown = 111 points (mostly in Misc. or Recreation Layers)
- Jefferson County Resource guide and lists = 543 points

As mentioned previously, the types of providers that participated in mapping session included government employees, community non-profit members, faith-based institution members, and a few private service providers. However, the majority of the providers, identified by Jefferson County Human Services,<sup>18</sup> were government employees or community non-profit providers. This distribution of participants may be able to explain some of the observed results in the proportions of resource types shown below in Figure 6. That is, provider type is highly correlated with the type of resources identified: government providers identified mainly government resources and services; community non-profits identified mainly community services; and faith-based identified mainly faith-based. This “silo” knowledge of providers demonstrates the pressing need to actively engage service providers from all sectors in order to build an integrated systems of care.

More specifically, faith-based resources were greatly under represented in the mapping sessions leading to two possible conclusions. Faith-based resources could not be readily available or widely known in Jefferson County; or, more likely, faith-based resources were under-identified because very few faith-based providers participated in the mapping sessions. As mentioned above, there is a high correlation between the type of provider and the types of resources identified by the provider. Although over a hundred faith-based groups were called to participate; most described themselves as providing services only to their congregation and had no interest in the “Connecting Communities for Kids” project. This outreach suggests that bringing the faith-based community into the systems of care could be a significant challenge.

GIS ANALYSIS OF RESOURCES

To do the GIS analysis, the resources identified by the mapping and focus group participants were verified using the 2004 Denver Metro phone book and/or Map Quest. The addresses were entered into an Excel spreadsheet, the type of resource and service was coded into one or more of the 24 type of resources, and the participant group and demographics were entered. The spreadsheet was imported into ArcMap and geo-coded to place the identified resources with known addresses on a common geographical coordinate system.

The 24 categories (or in GIS terminology, “layers”) of resource and service types were created by (1) working with participants in four pilot sessions to understand the way they conceptualized services; (2) presenting the pilot workshop information to Jefferson County Human Service employees to add categories that aligned with their current resource guides and experiences; and (3) aligning with the Aires taxonomy used by Colorado 2-1-1 system.<sup>19</sup> The resulting 24 layers allowed for some resources/services to be coded into more than one layer, thereby increasing the ability of information seekers to find the resource desired. For example, a service dedicated to providing transportation to elderly individuals would be included in Aging and Adult/Senior Services as well as Transportation Services. The dual coding in this project and used by the 2-1-1 system produces a comprehensive searchable data base that can reach a specific resource through multiple avenues.<sup>20</sup>

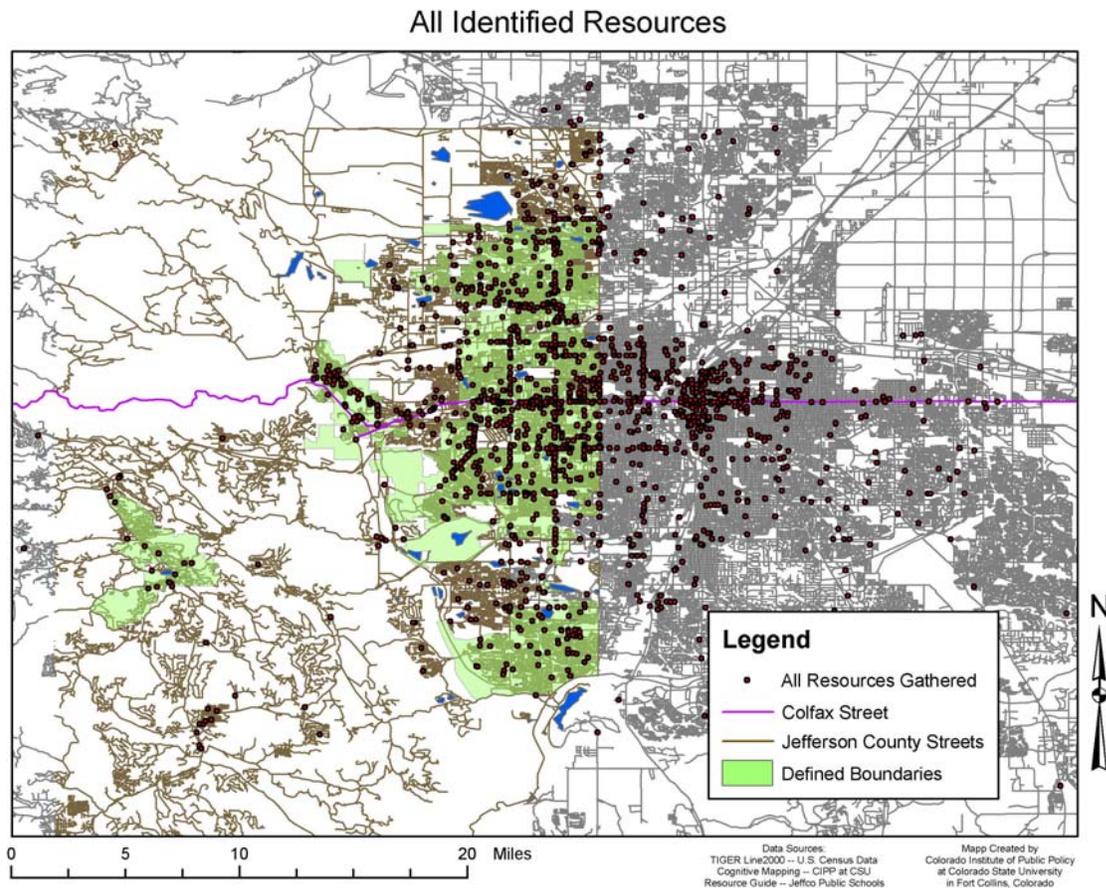

Figure 7 below shows all 3,845 resources identified and mapped. The number of unique points is 1,819 after removing the repeated information (see Appendix B for repeat counts by layer). Identified resources are distributed across all the Jefferson County study areas with a scattering throughout Denver County and a dense clustering along Colfax.

<sup>20</sup> Only the services identified by the participants or the resource guides were coded into layers. If there were additional services provided by a resource organization, these were unknown to CIPP. However, in the process of adding resources to the 2-1-1 database, each organization will be called and the full range of services will be entered into the 2-1-1 system.

Below is a description and discussion of each layer or category of resource in alphabetical order. To facilitate comparisons, all the maps for all the layers are displayed in Appendix C in alphabetical order of the layer name, referred to in this section as its Map #. The following Appendix D provides the names of all organizations and services identified in the mapping process that are currently not listed in the resource guides of Jefferson County.

Aging and Adult/Senior Services: This layer includes senior centers, transportation for seniors, Meals on Wheels, and other targeted resources. However, it does not include senior living facilities as those more accurately fit within Housing services. Twenty unique services were identified. Of the twenty, sixteen were identified by the cognitive mapping and four were identified using the Jeffco resource guides. Only one resource in the Jeffco guide was known to the mappers. As can be seen in the Map 7, the majority of the services identified are north of Colfax Street and no services in this category are identified in the Littleton or Golden areas. Important to note is that Clients and Providers had knowledge of different services as indicated in by the lack of overlap in services identified (see Map 8).

Anger Management Services: Only one service was identified in this category and it was by a Provider during a mapping session. It is likely that many more anger management resources exist as compliments to other services such as counseling, support groups, or mental health in general.

Anger Management as a category or layer is probably too specific or narrow to be adequately identified without follow up phone calls to each resource.<sup>21</sup>

Child Abuse Reporting and Prevention: Of the four child abuse reporting and prevention services, three were identified by only the cognitive mapping participants, two by both providers and clients, and one by clients only. Each of these services was identified multiple times indicating that child abuse reporting and prevention resources are well-known. It is interesting to note that the two resources identified within the defined boundaries are both located along the main traffic thoroughway of Colfax Street/Golden Road. One identified service is located in Denver (See Map 10).

Childcare: One hundred and eleven different providers were identified. As Figure 8 below shows (also see Map 11), there is very little overlap in knowledge between the Jefferson County resource guide and lists and the participants in the mapping workshops. This could indicate (1) clients and providers are not familiar with the childcare resources Jefferson County has identified; and (2) Jefferson County is not effectively disseminating this information. Many of the childcare resources identified in the Jefferson County resource guide and lists are before-school and after-school care programs. In contrast, the cognitive mapping participants identified pre-school childcare facilities rather than before and after-school programs as childcare. Based on this analysis, the current guides and lists are lacking in pre-school childcare resources. It is likely this information is housed with a specific organization rather than listed within Jeffco's resource guides; however, a consolidated database such as 2-1-1 will facilitate resource integration, information referral and client access.

From the perspective of building a systems of care, the additional childcare services distributed throughout the communities is encouraging. Since childcare is a pressing need, the identification of additional resources is important. It could be, however, that some of these participant-identified childcare services are not licensed, in which case these facilities would not be listed in the county's resource guides. Yet, in creating a community-based wrap-around system, informal services are important. Informal childcare may present one of the more difficult services to incorporate in a systems of care, yet an important one to utilize.

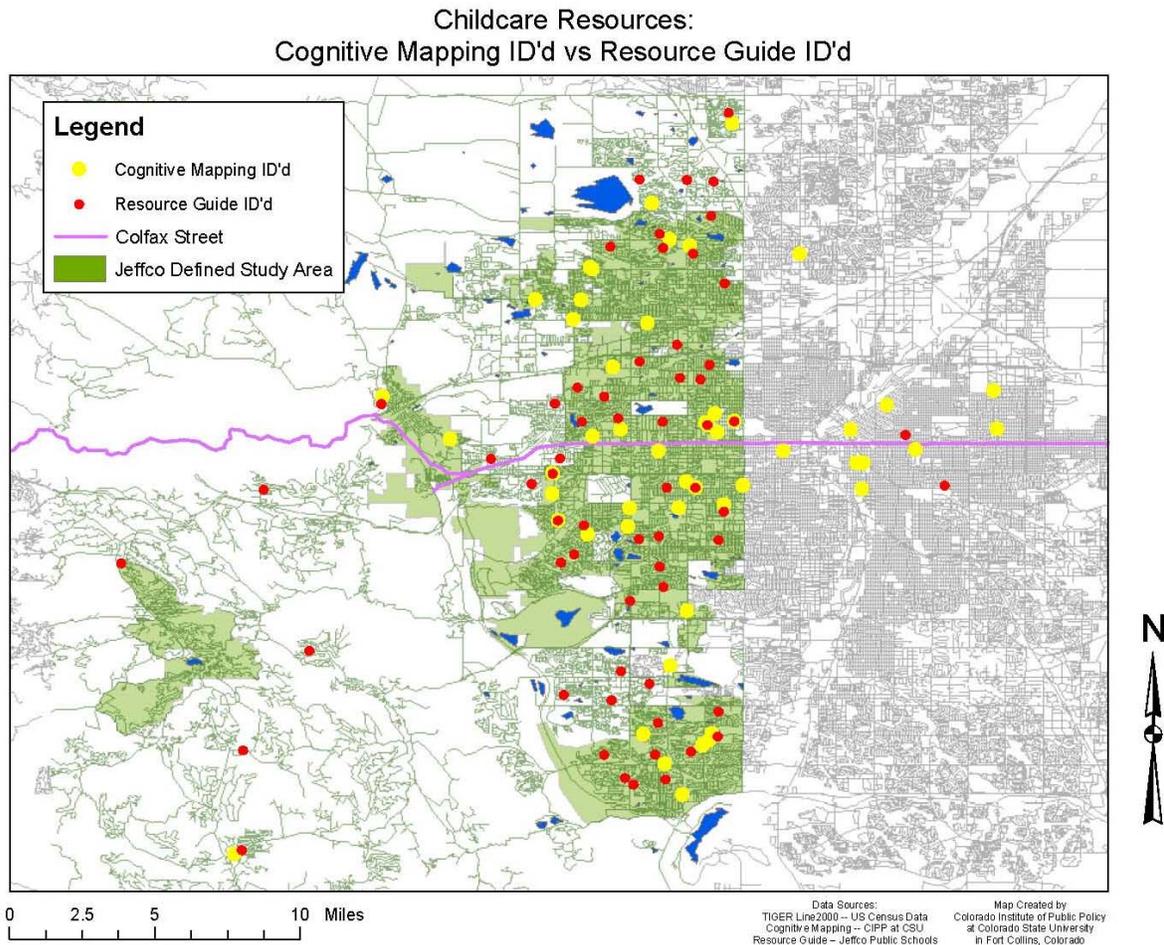

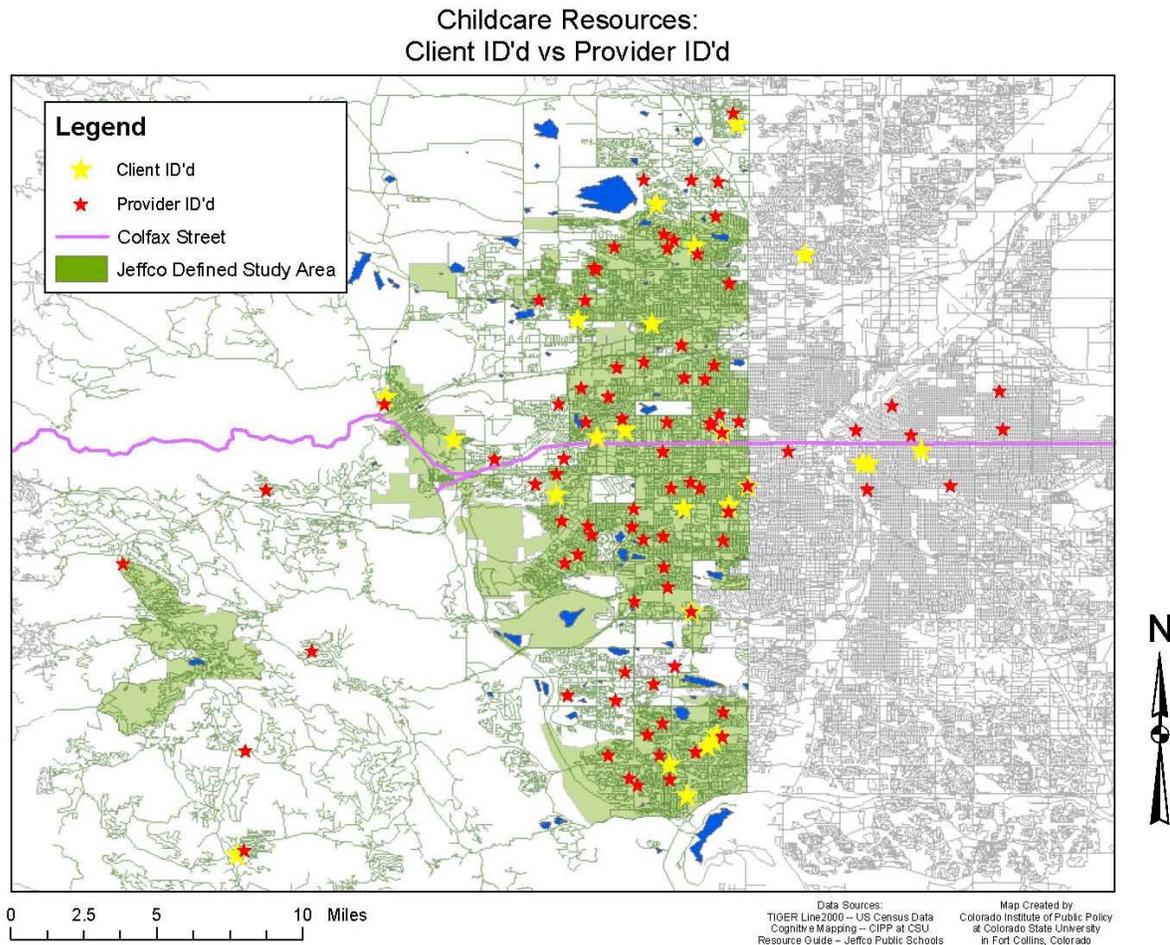

Figure 9 (Map 12) below shows the difference in knowledge of childcare resources between providers and clients. Here we can see that providers knew more resources than clients, but this may be a result of the before and after-school childcare identified in the resource guides, which are combined with providers at the mapping workshops. Clients were able to identify some childcare services unknown to the providers or Jefferson County, as seen by the yellow stars not overlapped with a red star.

Commercial: Commercial resources were identified in greater number (1600+) than any other resource. However, most of these resources were not mapped because they were identified mainly as landmarks to orient mappers in their identification of resources and services. The commercial resources identified as being used by a participant or identified as a strength or weakness were mapped. Eleven commercial resources were identified from the Jefferson County resource lists; all of these are thrift stores.

Figure 10 (Map 14) below is a map of the perceptions of the participants regarding different commercial resources. However, this data can be somewhat misleading without adding a caveat about the respondents' demographics. For example, a 7-11 that sells cigarettes to minors was identified as a Positive resource by a few teenagers but the same store was identified as a Negative resource by their teacher for the same reason. It is interesting to note, however, that only four negatives appear south of Colfax Street while twenty four negatives were identified along or north of Colfax Street.

Developmental Disabilities Resources (DDR): A total of 26 DDR separate resources were identified. The Jefferson County resource lists were useful at providing information regarding DDR services available in Denver; but only five DDR services are within the defined boundaries of Jefferson County. On the other hand, the cognitive mapping process revealed ten DDR resources within the defined boundaries, seven of which are not on the Jeffco lists (see Map 16). The Clients knew about two of the seven resources; therefore, the majority of DDR services knowledge existed within the provider group (see Map 17). This may have occurred because DDR services are fairly specific and the cognitive mapping process did not target special needs clients (with the exception of some adoptive parent workshops whose children tended to have special needs). It is reasonable to assume a more diverse client participant group would have identified more resources in this category.

Domestic Violence Prevention and Treatment: This layer does not have many resources that can be mapped because shelters for victims of domestic violence have confidential addresses. Therefore, the maps for this layer do not accurately represent the number of resources identified, nor can an accurate duplication count be created for this layer because the duplication calculation is based on addresses. However, of the resources that did have addresses only one resource is south of Colfax Street within the defined boundaries (see Map 18). While this is not consistently true for each layer, the extreme southern part of the defined area (Littleton) does not have nearly as many identified resources in either the Jefferson County lists or through the cognitive mapping process.

Drug and Alcohol Abuse Treatment: A total of 54 distinct treatment centers/resources were identified. The majority of the resources and services in this layer were identified by the cognitive mapping process, with only eleven resources coming from Jefferson County (see Map 19). Although an additional five resources in Denver County were identified by Jefferson County resource lists, the cognitive mapping process also produced more information for this layer in Denver County. The distribution of resources seemed relatively even across the defined boundaries with a tighter concentration along Colfax Street, as to be expected. As seen in Figure 11 (Map 20), the overwhelming majority of the resources and/or services identified in the mapping process were identified by providers rather than clients. As was frequently the case, providers at the mapping workshops had extensive knowledge of resources that went beyond the information in the Jefferson County resource guides.

Education: There were 366 education resources identified. This is the category that Jefferson County guides and lists had the most resources identified. As would be expected, the Jefferson County Public Schools Resource Guide lists all the primary and secondary public schools, as well as a few private schools in the county. Figure 12 (Map 21) below shows there is very little additional information provided by the mapping sessions with regard to education resources in Jefferson County; however, the mapping identified a significant number of resources in Denver. The few Jefferson County education resources that were not identified in the resource guides were typically services such as breast-feeding classes located at hospitals, ESL classes available at community centers and/or libraries, and other educational services available at libraries.

The next Figure 13 (Map 22) shows that the knowledge about educational services is relatively equal between providers and clients. Most of the points contain both a yellow star (client identified and a red star (provider/resource guide identified), indicating there is little improvement needed on information dissemination about education resources and services in Jefferson County.

Emergency Services: Of the 123 emergency services, few were identified by Jefferson County within their own defined boundaries, most were located in Denver (see Map 23). The cognitive mapping process produced a far greater number of resources and services within Jefferson County than did the resource lists at a nearly three to one ratio (see Map 24). Despite this fact the greatest concentration of Emergency Services identified by all groups was in downtown Denver and along Colfax Street.

Employment Resources: Forty-four different employment resources were identified. Twice as many of these were found through the mapping process than listed in the Jefferson County guide and lists (see Map 25). Providers, rather than clients, identified most of the resources (see Map 26). While less concentrated in location than the emergency services, there were somewhat more employment services identified in Denver.

Family Assistance and Nutrition Resources: Fifty-four resources were identified. The Jefferson County resource lists provided information throughout the county plus a concentration of services available in the downtown Denver area (see Map 27). The cognitive mapping process provided information primarily in Jefferson County, concentrated slightly in the Golden area. The overwhelming majority of the cognitively mapped resources were identified by providers and Jefferson County guidebooks, not clients (see Map 28).

Health Care Resources: Of the 190 health care resources, 140 were identified by the cognitive mapping process with only one third of the services identified by both participants and the Jefferson County resource lists. However, as seen in the Figure 14 (Map 29) below, the Jefferson County resource lists also have information about several health care services in Denver. Most of the Denver and Jefferson County services were also identified by the cognitive mapping process. Information from the cognitive mapping process adds significantly to the health care knowledge base for Jefferson County.

Housing Resources: Finding the addresses of all the housing resources identified was difficult because many housing options known by clients were apartment complexes without names. Map Quest was unable to locate most of these points. However, of the 105 coded resources most consisted of housing assistance services rather than actual living locations. These agency offices were primarily identified through the cognitive mapping process (only ten are listed in the Jeffco guides, see Map 31) and once again overwhelming by providers rather than clients (see Map 32). This repeated pattern for many of the layers suggests a large gap in the information available through Jefferson County to both providers and clients. While providers are clearly knowledgeable about resources in the communities, a lack of a comprehensive database disadvantages new social workers and their clients.

Mental Health Resources: Of the 97 mental health resources and services, many were concentrated primarily around Colfax Street and downtown Denver. Services not in these two locations were evenly distributed through the rest of the defined boundaries except near the extreme northern and extreme southern (Littleton area) portions. The cognitive mapping provided information on the location of several additional services both in Jefferson County and Denver County (see Map 33). Figure 15 (Map 34) below shows that clients know about the clustered areas of service but are not as knowledgeable as the providers in other areas.

Mentoring and Advocacy Resources: There was very little information in the Jefferson County guide and lists regarding Mentoring resources and services. All but one resource was identified by the cognitive mapping participants (see Map 35). Of the 27 mentoring resources identified, 19 were identified exclusively by providers, five exclusively by clients and two by both groups (see Map 36). Once again, no resources were identified in the Littleton area.

Miscellaneous Resources: These 91 different resources are a combination of services that did not neatly fit into the other layers, or were resources for which a specific service could not be identified. Follow up calls, which will be done by 2-1-1, with the identified organizations can better clarify the services provided. This layer is primarily filled with cognitively mapped resources because the Jefferson County lists described the types of services at each resource location (see Map 37).

Offense-Specific Resources: This layer was reserved for a very specific subset of services, e.g., sexual offenders services, youth rehabilitation services, etc. As a result only 11 resources were identified and every point was identified by a provider in one of the cognitive mapping sessions.

Recreation Resources: This layer contained 264 unique recreation resources. Most were parks, skate parks, gyms, recreation centers, and schools with after-school activities available. Not surprisingly, the cognitive mapping provided almost all of the points on the map (see Map 40); only four were listed in the Jefferson County guidebooks. This is one of the few layers where the clients provide roughly an equal number of points to the map as the providers (see Maps 41, 42 and 43). This is partly due to people identifying prominent physical features (such as Green Mountain Lake Park) instead of specific services located in an office. But it is also the result of clients viewing recreational facilities and areas as social service resources, e.g., providing formal and informal youth activities.

Safety and Legal Resources: There were 118 safety and legal resources identified. This layer included all governmental entities, such as the Jefferson County Government complex, all fire and police stations, courthouses of all levels, and in some cases legal offices, when identified as providing pro-bono services. Most locations (n=99) were identified by the cognitive mapping process probably because participants used fire stations, police stations, and courthouses not only as services but as landmarks in their mapping process (see Maps 45 and 46). This layer has the most repeated resource of all single resources identified: Jefferson County Government buildings at or around the address of 100 Jefferson County Parkway.

Social and Spiritual Resources: This layer was created to include all identified churches and other such social resources that might not easily fit into recreation. All 210 resources were identified by the cognitive mapping (see Map 47). While a bingo hall might be classified in the Recreation layer and in this layer, something such as a knitting circle or book club group might not fit as easily into recreational activities, especially when the majority of the recreation-type services or resources described here are based on physical activity. Informal social support and valuable community network and information sharing occur in social situations such as book clubs or at church services and activities.

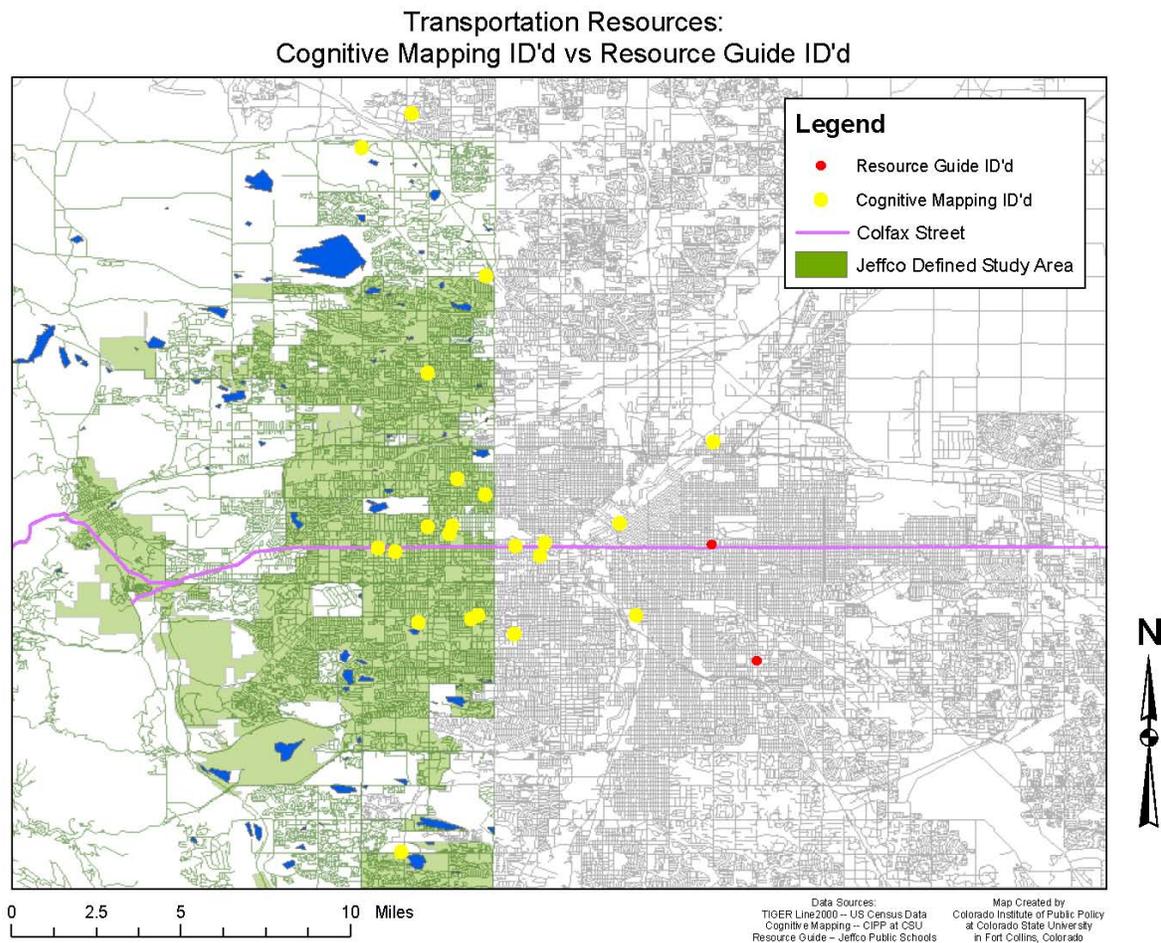

The majority of the points identified in this layer are churches. A large portion of these churches were not identified as having other services available at the location probably because many participants used churches as navigational landmarks. However, a small number of the identified churches or other religion-based structures were known to have multiple uses. For example, some churches were identified as soup kitchens, which allowed them to be placed in the Emergency Services layer as well. The Jewish Literacy Center was also placed in the Education layer. This was one of the few layers with multiple resources located in the Littleton area.

The few faith-based providers that participated in the mapping workshops were knowledgeable about multiple services provided in the faith-based community. As noted previously, this is a group that may have many resources and prove to be good partners in a systems of care; however, they are not easily brought into the process. Successful recruitment is likely to require a person both familiar with the religious community and who is known and respected by them.

Support Group Resources: Very little information was provided by the Jefferson County resource lists (n=3) or from the cognitive mapping process (n=2) regarding support group services (see Maps 48 and 49). It is likely that many support groups occur at locations such as churches, mental health centers, etc., therefore were not specifically identified by the participants. Follow-up calls to organizations will likely increase the number of support group services available within organizations identified in the cognitive mapping process.

Transportation Resources: As shown in Figure 17 (Map 50), the 25 transportation resources were largely identified through the mapping process with the exception of two resources located in Denver (see Map 51). These two resources are, however, important transportation services provided to disabled individuals. It is interesting to note that the Jefferson County resource lists only have the two Denver-based services listed and do not list the three Jefferson County transportation services for the disabled.

Victim Services: This layer overlapped with the Domestic Violence Prevention and Treatment layer because of the inclusion of women’s shelters. Once again the issue of address confidentiality prevented these services from being placed on the maps. However, of the seven services identified and mapped successfully most of them are located along the Colfax Street corridor (see Maps 52 and 53).

SUMMARY

There are several trends that appear in almost all of the resource categories discussed above. First, there are very few resources/services identified in the Littleton area, whether through the mapping process or the Jefferson County resource guide and lists. It is likely that due to the affluence of most of the Littleton area many social services are not sought out by Littleton residents. However, if more Littleton participants had been recruited, resources such as parks, schools, childcare, health care (hospitals and clinics), and possibly mental health services would be identified, since all of these resources are needed by everyone regardless of income or social status.

Second, the Jefferson County resource guide and lists have limited information. Except in education and childcare, the resource guide and lists fell far short of the number of resources identified by the mapping participants. While there are many childcare resources in the Jeffco information guides, there is little overlap between the Jefferson County guide resources and the cognitive mapping identified resources.

Third, there are a significant number of resources in Denver that providers and clients could identify. Many times these resources are located on or near Colfax, easily accessible locations from east central Jefferson County. Accessibility as well as lack of availability of the resources in Jefferson County may account for this trend.

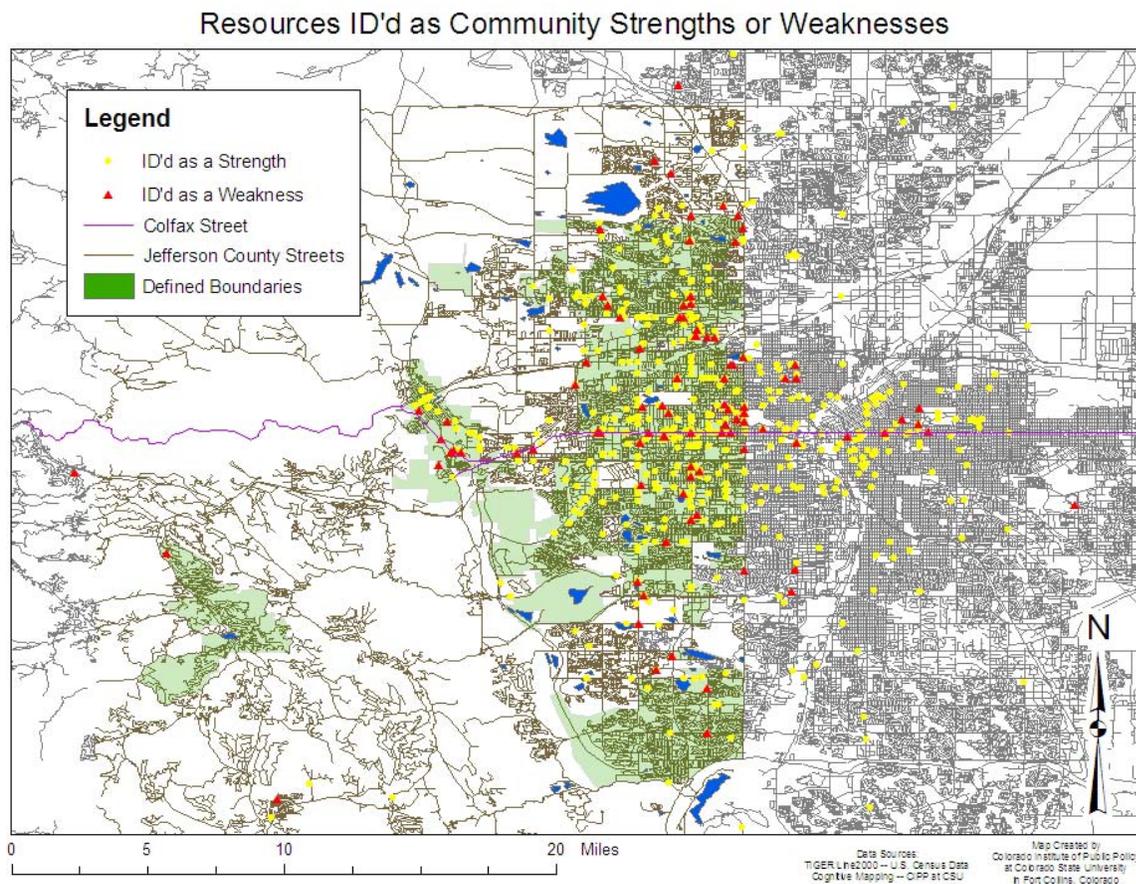

Fourth, opposite of the previous trend, Jefferson County resource guides provided mainly Denver locations for some types of resources even though the same resources exist in numerous places in Jefferson County.

Finally, there is a large disparity in knowledge between clients and providers. With the exception of the Education, Recreation, and Commercial, the providers and clients did not overlap significantly in knowledge about resources. Providers have more knowledge about traditional resources such as other agencies or governmentally-supported social services, while clients know about resources of a less traditional nature, such as churches, motels, and parks where teenagers gathered to socialize and engage in recreational sports activities. Although these informal resources are not referral services that providers typically pass along to clients, they are important community-based resources to share with clients. In creating a community-based SOC, providers need to be aware of the alternative methods clients use to meet their needs. In some instances, this new information will lead to the creation of government/community partnerships to more effectively and efficiently deliver services. In other circumstances, the additional knowledge of resources will provide clients with options and/or fill gaps in needs that traditional government and community providers cannot meet.

COMMUNITY STRENGTHS AND WEAKNESSES

A total of 487 community strengths and 281 community weaknesses were identified by participants. Importantly, participants identified significantly more strengths than weaknesses and there was a fairly even geographical distribution. In other words, there are no clusters of weakness or strengths, indicating that participants perceive all areas to be a combination of both. Figure 18 geographically plots the total strengths and weaknesses identified during the mapping sessions.

COMMUNITY STRENGTHS

Participants were asked to define “strength” broadly in both the mapping sessions and focus groups. They were instructed that strengths could include, for example, specific schools or recreation centers, a strong sense of community in their neighborhood, or many parks in the area. Participants were asked to prioritize strengths, identifying the three most important ones in the community. Types of strengths by resource layer are provided in Table 8. Specific explanations of each layer follows. Appendix E contains a complete list of community strengths indicated by participants, including the type of participant who identified it. The variety of responses demonstrates that the participants thought carefully and personally about what they considered to be community strengths.

TABLE 8: COMMUNITY STRENGTHS BY RESOURCE LAYER

Resource layer	Percent of total strengths listed
Recreation	31%
Education	12%
Commercial	11%
Health care	7%

Resource layer	Percent of total strengths listed
Employment	3%
Mental health services	1%
Transportation	1%
Housing	1%
Other	32%

Recreation Facilities. The table above highlights the common value participants place on the recreation facilities in their communities. This frequent identification of recreation as a strength was consistent with verbal comments by participants during the sessions. Most participants who attended a workshop at one of the city recreation centers were already familiar with these facilities. Although comments were made about the cost of taking an entire family to the recreation centers, most clients were familiar with the family discount days and activity hours, and believed the facilities to be well-maintained and safe. Many people cited local parks and bike paths as recreation strengths for exercise and places for children to play. Those identified as strengths were described as free and conveniently located. Public libraries represented another large portion of recreation strengths. Although fewer participants expressed knowledge about specific programs available at their local libraries, participants generally described libraries as a free source of entertainment where children are welcome. The focus on free sources of entertainment, particularly for youth, was also reflected in some of the commercial strengths listed above. Several participants felt that local malls like Colorado Mills were safe and free places for youth to gather.

Education. The second most frequently mentioned strength was education-related resources. The majority of education strengths listed was local elementary, middle, and senior high schools. Red Rocks Community College was also frequently mentioned, as were several of the Head Start programs. In general, most participants did not specifically articulate why these resources were strengths beyond providing education. However, some included additional programs as strengths, such as free lunch and breakfast programs, and childcare and educational support provided by Head Start programs.

Commercial. A number of commercial businesses were also listed as community strengths by participants. Most participants focused on clothing stores that have inexpensive items. Several grocery stores were listed as strengths because of their low prices. A few participants pointed out businesses that accept emergency vouchers or who make charity donations to local non-profit programs. Like recreation and education resources, participants' reasons for listing commercial resources seemed to center on those that fit with their financial capabilities.

Health Care. Participants also indicated some health care resources as strengths in their communities. Lutheran Medical and The Children's Hospital were listed often, as were various WIC offices. Many participants did not articulate the reasons they saw these health care resources to be community strengths, but among those who did, the reasons focused on affordability or willingness of provider to work on a sliding scale or file with Medicaid.

Other Strengths. Finally, a strength was listed as "Other" if it was unclear why the participant believed the resource to be a strength (e.g., churches, government agencies, or non-profits without specific services listed as strengths), or if the type of strength was infrequently mentioned. (e.g., only one person mentioned that fire stations provide tours and classes for Boy and Girl Scouts).

TABLE 9: COMMUNITY STRENGTHS BY RESOURCE TYPE

Resource type	Percent of total strengths listed
Government	51%
Non-profit	21%
Private	16%
Faith-based	7%

As seen in the table above, most of the strengths listed by participants were government-sponsored agencies. This is perhaps not surprising given that many of the participants were either government providers or clients who work with County government systems. Also, participants focused on inexpensive recreational strengths, such as recreation centers and parks, schools, and health care programs, which are frequently governmentally sponsored.

Quite a few non-profit agencies were also identified as community strengths. Community non-profit services listed as strengths were often resources that provide a variety of services and referrals, such as Family Tree Inc. or the JeffCo Action Center. These organizations appear to be well-known by providers and clients alike.

Private and faith-based organizations were also considered to be strengths by many participants. The majority of private strengths listed were local retailers. Some private sources of recreation were also listed, such as Pirate's Cove, golf courses, and ice arenas. Nearly all faith-based strengths listed were local churches. Most participants did not specify the reason that these faith-based resources were community strengths, but those who did focused on food banks and other emergency services coordinated through these congregations. Others were simply members of the congregation who felt that their church provided social support and an open place to worship.

COMMUNITY WEAKNESSES

A total of 281 total community weaknesses were identified by participants. Participants were asked to define weakness broadly, including anything from an agency with which they have experienced difficulty obtaining services to the lack of affordable housing in their area. It should be noted that participants identified substantially more strengths in their community than weaknesses. Below, breakdowns of these weaknesses by resource layer and type are provided, as well as more specific explanations of each grouping. Appendix F contains a complete list of community weaknesses indicated by participants, including the type of participant who identified it.

TABLE 10: COMMUNITY WEAKNESSES BY RESOURCE LAYER

Resource layer	Percent of total weaknesses listed
Bad area	28%
Commercial	14%

Resource layer	Percent of total weaknesses listed
Transportation	10%
Recreation	6%
Education	5%
Health care	4%
Mental health services	4%
Housing	3%
Employment	1%
Other	25%

“Bad Area.” The largest category of weaknesses is the generic term “bad area,” which represents those areas where drugs and/or prostitution were apparent to participants or where they generally felt unsafe. Participants also mentioned slum hotel housing, gang activity, and crime as reasons that certain areas were weaknesses. Many of these bad areas were on or near Colfax Street.

Commercial. One out of every seven weaknesses identified were commercial businesses. Although few participants listed specific reasons why certain commercial establishments were weaknesses, the majority of commercial weaknesses listed were liquor stores and adult book stores. This is perhaps not surprising, given that these two kinds of stores were used by the facilitators during the mapping sessions as examples of possible community weaknesses.

Transportation. Quite a few participants also saw transportation problems as community weaknesses. Most participants who listed transportation as a weakness indicated that public transportation was not scheduled frequently enough, late enough, and did not serve enough areas. During the workshops, many participants voiced frustration that it was unnecessarily complicated and time consuming to take the public bus system to Jefferson County Human Services in Golden, and that this bus route did not run past 5 p.m. Some participants also mentioned particular intersections where accidents were frequent. Again, the latter was one of the examples of a possible weakness used by facilitators during the mapping sessions.

Recreation. Despite the large number of participants who viewed recreation opportunities as community strengths, a few saw community weaknesses in this area. Participants who listed recreation resources as weaknesses generally discussed unsafe public parks or parks lacking in playground equipment. Some participants said city recreation centers were too expensive, and lacked sufficient activities for older children and teens. Several participants made general comments about the lack of after-school programs, especially for adolescents.

Fewer than 5% of the community weaknesses fell in the education, health care, mental health services, housing, or employment. Among the education resources listed as weaknesses, most participants specified under-funded public schools that were in disrepair, unsafe, or did not offer programs for special student groups. A few participants mentioned schools that were inappropriate for high-risk youth, and whose administrative discipline policies worked poorly. Health care weaknesses generally focused on the lack of affordable options for low-income and/or non-insured families.

Participants who listed mental health services as weaknesses generally mentioned the lack of funding/capacity at JCMH, or a lack of mental health services/knowledge at local hospitals and public agencies. Others simply mentioned a general difficulty finding and accessing mental health services. Finally, the majority of those who listed housing as a community weakness generally commented that there was a lack of affordable housing options in their area. Most people mentioned housing as a concern for various reasons.

Other Weaknesses. A large number of weaknesses also fell into the “other” category. This was likely due to the encouragement of participants to think broadly about what they saw as weaknesses, resulting in very specific, unique responses. The majority of weaknesses falling into the “other” category were general comments about the area, such as a lack of cultural diversity, the high cost of living, or the lack of funding for government agencies and non-profits.

TABLE 11: COMMUNITY WEAKNESSES BY RESOURCE TYPE***

Resource type of weakness	Percent of total weaknesses listed
Government	27%
Non-profit	16%
Private	5%
Faith-based	0%

* The weakness types by percent above sum to less than 100%. Weaknesses in the category of “bad area” or other weaknesses that were not necessarily under the control of any particular resource type (e.g., lack of employment opportunities, racial tension) were not assigned to a provider type.

As with the strengths, government-sponsored agencies comprise the largest portion of community weaknesses identified by participants (see Table 11). Education, followed by transportation and then recreation represented the majority of governmental weaknesses listed. The prevalence of government-sponsored agencies cited as weaknesses is likely the result of government agencies identified as the most common provider.

The strong representation of community non-profits in the weaknesses listed by participants may be somewhat misleading. Thirty percent of the reasons given for why non-profit resources were considered a weakness mentioned lack of funding and thus service availability, rather than the organization itself, was the problem. Given the low number of faith-based resources identified on the maps, it is not surprising that faith-based organizations are not represented here. Almost all of the private organizations listed were commercial businesses.

SERVICES CLIENTS REPORT USING

The figures below reflect the percentage of participants who completed at least some portion of the survey on service usage. It is important to keep in mind that the services currently being used are self-reported. Respondents may have provided incomplete lists, and most did not provide a list at all. Also, two workshops consisted entirely of TANF clients, so TANF and related resources may be over-represented here. Appendix G contains a complete list of resources currently used by participants, including the type of participant using each resource.

SERVICES PARTICIPANTS IDENTIFY AS LACKING

The final portion of the survey asked participants to identify services they felt were lacking or needs that were not being met. It is important to note that this was an optional, open-ended response. Many respondents did not list any services they felt were lacking and many only listed one. The figures below indicate the percent of total resource deficiencies listed by category. Categories containing less than one percent of the total deficiencies are excluded. Appendix H contains a complete list of needed services indicated by participants, including the type of participant who identified it as such.

INFORMATION FROM FOCUS GROUPS

When working with the ethnic enclaves, language barriers made focus groups more appropriate than mapping workshops.<sup>22</sup> Below, the feedback from each group is summarized.

RUSSIAN FOCUS GROUP<sup>23</sup>

Six ESL Russian students at Red Rocks Community College participated in the focus group. Most of these students were political refugees from their home countries with only rudimentary English skills. They had little knowledge of the resources available to them. For example, although each participant said finding work was their greatest struggle, none knew about the Tri-County Workforce Center. Their lack of information about services might also stem from an orientation toward self-reliance rather than looking to the government for assistance. For example, most did not see unemployment help as a government responsibility. When questioned about resources they frequently used, most mentioned parks and libraries, particularly the Glendale Library with its large collection of Russian books. While Russian-speaking groups are somewhat disbursed in the county, there are small pockets in the county (see Figure 3). Frequently, they gather at local Russian Orthodox churches for a sense of a community and to pass on their heritage to their children. Lutheran Social Services was integral to their journey and adjustment to the United States in almost every case due to their refugee status. While most high school students are provided with the opportunity to take ESL classes, this is not the case for elementary school children. Fortunately, younger children generally learn the basics of a second language more easily than youths and adults. Children, therefore, often serve as translators for the entire family, which can be both beneficial and detrimental to the health and well-being of the child and his/her family members.

LATINO FOCUS GROUPS<sup>24</sup>

The Learning Source provided access to two classrooms with 10-15 native Spanish-speaking students in each who had low-level English skills. The table below lists the resources that were deemed important by these groups.

TABLE 14. RESOURCES IDENTIFIED BY SPANISH-SPEAKING ESL CLASSES DURING FOCUS GROUPS

Resource	Services	Comments
Belmar Library (and others)	Computers, reading materials for children and adults in Spanish	The library needs bilingual staff to assist library patrons in finding materials and using resources. (The teacher informed us that they did have such personnel at one time, but the position was discontinued due to under-utilization.)

<sup>22</sup> CIPP employed a translator who was a native language speaker for all ethnic focus groups.

Resource	Services	Comments
Comfort Dental	Low-cost dental care for low income
West Side Clinic	Health care for low income	Very full, can take weeks to get an appt, and even then often so full that the wait is several hours and STILL can be asked to return the next day
MCPN Clinic	Health care for low income; bilingual staff
Gold Crown Foundation	Sports, activities for children sixth grade and up for free
Denver Boys' & Girls' Club	$2 to join, art classes, billiards, basketball, swimming, camping, computers, ballet, etc
Emily Griffith Opportunity School	Certified Nurse's Assistant (CNA) training (and other job training) in Spanish
Denver Health	Health care for low income
Operation Comadres	Help women with medical expenses
Guadalupe Church	Various forms of assistance
Children's Health Insurance Program (CHIP)	Discount card for health care

Colorado Parent Magazine	Tells parents where they can find activities for their children	Delivered free to institutions, is only in English but easy to read
Albertson's	Computer program at store for searching and applying for jobs with Albertson's in Spanish
1280 AM	Daily job listings
St Catchatans	Job fair twice a year

The participants at The Learning Source suggested the following as weaknesses in their communities:

- Some of the greatest frustration was expressed with finding job training and employment. An interest was expressed in more training available in Spanish (e.g., for nursing positions).

Workers with specific training in their home countries need a way to learn the terminology for their profession in the U.S. as well as a means for transferring degrees/licensure to the U.S.

- Sloan's Lake Park and other parks in the area need additional security to ensure that they are places where families can spend time. At this time, many of the parks are inhabited by intoxicated people, criminals, and prostitutes.
- Like many people, this group was concerned with being unable to obtain health insurance, particularly for their children.
- Undocumented workers would like some way to obtain a driver's license.

NATIVE AMERICAN FOCUS GROUP<sup>25</sup>

CIPP conducted a focus group with seven Native Americans at the Denver Indian Family Resource Center (DIFRC). The most frequently discussed issues were obtaining housing, medical and other resources for their children. The following are some of the resources that they used and some of their comments.

TABLE 15. RESOURCES IDENTIFIED BY NATIVE AMERICAN CLIENTS DURING FOCUS GROUP

Resource	Services	Comments
2-1-1	Resource referral	Fast; provides comprehensive, helpful information

Denver Indian Center	Variety of services for Native Americans (employment, education)	Free for enrolled members of tribes
Curtis Park Child Care Center	Low-cost childcare	For low or no income individuals (shelters will pay part of childcare expenses), TANF clients (TANF pays part of childcare expense)

Denver Rescue Mission	Homeless shelter
Denver Health Medical Center	Low-cost health care

Denver Indian Family Resource Center	Variety of services for Native Americans (employment, education)
TANF	Education, childcare
Parks College	Medical billing and other vocational classes	Not free

This group of Native Americans also mentioned the following weaknesses in their communities:

- Once a child turns 18, they are no longer eligible to stay in shelters with their parents. In some cases, this results in the children moving in with an abusive parent or other relative. In general, there are not a lot of resources for young people (18-25) who are not mature enough to make it on their own but are considered adults.
- There are not enough resources focused on keeping families together.
- Many programs have been cut and social workers are no longer able to be as helpful.
- No resources exist to help clients purchase cars or pay for auto insurance. Mechanics available through TANF and Family Tree require a license and proof of insurance before they will repair a vehicle. Gas vouchers can also only be accessed with license and proof of insurance.
- For those who have lost their driver's license, there are no resources to assist them in getting it back.
- Generally, finding resources requires a lot of effort on the part of the client.
- Some resources will only serve people in their counties, even if people live across the street from the county boundary. As people move around, they lose services that they still need (e.g., a client reported Interfaith Hospitality Network serves only Arapahoe County, which resulted in her losing services when she moved to the other side of a fence).
- Some homeless shelters are located quite a distance from children's schools, making it difficult for children to attend due to a lack of transportation.

YOUTH FOCUS GROUP<sup>26</sup>

Seven young adults at The Road attended a focus session to tell us about the services they use. The Road is a drop-in youth center that targets youth with mental health needs.

TABLE 16. RESOURCES IDENTIFIED BY YOUNG ADULT CLIENTS DURING FOCUS GROUP

Resource	Services	Comments
The Summit Center	Adult clubhouse like The Road for people 18+, computer training
Lakewood, Belmar, and other libraries	Internet access, conference rooms, books, get copyright info/license
Guardian Angels	Neighborhood watch program, prevent violence, help police, give back to community	Wear uniform, no weapons, 3 months training, all volunteer, teach martial arts and women's self defense classes
Tri-County Workforce Center	Job board, internet, job database	Not very good or helpful for younger people, most jobs posted require experience or some special licensing
Movie theatres	Colorado Cinema, AMC24 theater, Belmar, Drive-In, $2 theater at Kipling
Wheat Ridge Recreation Center	Weight room, sauna, pool, rock climbing, basketball courts; educational courses (e.g., accounting, marketing, computers)	Costs money each time or for annual pass
ARC thrift store

Children's Health Insurance Program (CHIP)	HIV testing and education
Rainbow Alley	College/job references; Gay, Lesbian, Bi-sexual, and Transgendered (GLBT) youth center
Children's Hospital		Youth psychological ward does not give enough consideration to desires of the patient; willing to release the child to any adult regardless of the child's wishes or their relationship to the child
Melbourne Hostel	Leads to organizations like Green Peace, inexpensive lodging, help immigrants
The Denver Hostel
Why Vote	Helps teens vote, political awareness, focuses on ages 18-25
Family Tree
Jeffco Action Center

The participants at The Road also suggested the following as weaknesses in their community:

- Resource information is not widely distributed; systems like 2-1-1 are not sufficient.

- Youth need to be given more of a voice in their community through youth councils and other programs. Youth councils must also represent the entire youth population rather than just a narrow segment.
- DMV offices need to be more numerous and more broadly distributed.

SUMMARY

From the summaries of each ethnic enclave focus group provided above, it is apparent that the groups differ significantly from the population as a whole and from each other. For example, while the Native Americans associated with the Denver Indian Family Resource Center (DIFRC) were aware of many of the resources available to them, potentially due to their involvement with the DIFRC, the Russian and Latino groups primarily reported a lack of knowledge about community resources. However, the Russian group felt that accessing resources would signal weakness or failure on their part and thus they were not eager to do so; while the Latino groups seemed very anxious to learn more about what might be available to them. Of the resources that were identified, the Latino groups focused primarily on health care resources, the Russian group was accessing mostly faith-based resources, and the Native American group seemed most knowledgeable about resources for homeless families. One note of encouragement was that the young people at The Road were aware of a broad array of resources and seemed interested in being proactive in their communities to develop additional needed services.

Overall, it is clear that each major group in a county as diverse as Jefferson County has special needs, interests, and cultural values that influence their ability and willingness to access resources. It is essential that case workers and other personnel seeking to serve these groups be trained extensively in how to meet these groups' unique needs. Without culturally competent provision of services, it is unlikely that members of some of these groups will ever receive the assistance they need.

CONCLUSION

Cognitive mapping combined with GIS analysis is a powerful method for identifying community resources. The addition of 1,480 resource locations within the seven study areas (only a portion of Jefferson County) nearly triples the number of resources and services listed in the Jefferson County guides.

It has always been a challenge to keep resource guides up to date; and even a greater challenge to distribute the information widely; but the partnership built with Colorado's 2-1-1 system greatly reduces both of these information barriers. All resources identified in this project, including the Jefferson County guides and lists, are housed with 2-1-1. Caseworkers as well as clients will be able to access the information either on-line or by calling 2-1-1.

Ultimately, service delivery in a systems of care is about building partnerships across the multiple services AND bringing in new, even sometimes untraditional, community partners. Family involvement is the key in this collaborative arrangement. Like untraditional community partners and resources, families as partners do not fit easily within current social service delivery structures, values, and beliefs. Recognizing, valuing, and partnering with resource providers identified by clients is one important step toward shifting practices.

* Borderline represents Resource Layers that appear to be close to reaching the 80% repeat threshold, the level determined by CIPP to be the optimal level of information return on time and resource investment. Higher repeat rates indicate fewer unknown community resources. In other words, increasing levels of confidence that most of the resources and services have been identified is associated with higher repeat rates. Originally, the goal was to have 450 participants; Jefferson County SOC Human Services requested the number be reduced to 250. More maps would have produced higher category repeats. Note: the 80% repeat threshold in categories with small overall counts may not accurately represent the actual degree of information saturation.
